

VeloCity at the Hub; HR unveils career tool

The local high-tech community will be out in force tonight for the grand opening of the "Communitech Hub" — a concentration of labs and businesses in the digital media field, based at the recycled Tannery buildings on Charles Street in downtown Kitchener (right). Space at the actual event, which runs from 5 to 7 p.m., is sold out, Communitech says, but the proceedings will be livestreamed.

Among the facilities at the Hub, it was announced this week, will be a "workspace" for the university's student incubator program, VeloCity. Eligible for space at the Tannery, and the use of Accelerator Centre services and guidance, are present and former Waterloo students with "an early-stage product or service idea considered to fit in the broader 'digital media or mobile technology' industry". The privilege of tables and chairs, Internet, and "working around a great network of people" will be assigned four months at a time. "The goal of the VeloCity workspace is to help you get to a point where you have revenue that will enable you to either become self-sufficient or a strong candidate for a position in the Accelerator Centre."